Sources

- References to sources are to be integrated into the footnotes (no separate indices) and should follow internationally-recognized editions; Leibniz texts should be cited from the Academy Edition (provided they have already been published there), otherwise from generally-available editions (cf. list of abbreviations in Studia Leibnitiana below).

- Defined abbreviations may be included for identification of quotations in brackets in the main text: the list of abbreviations from Studia Leibnitiana may be followed without further explanation; further abbreviations should be introduced with the first literature reference in question; repeated reference to a title should take the form of author’s surname (an abbreviated title should be given if several works of an author are cited) and page number.

- Not separately published titles and quotations are set in (double) inverted commas, these should be in the original language; in certain cases it is also possible to quote from translations, then however the cited translation must be preceded in the list of references by an internationally-available edition; lists of references should be separated by semicolons (e.g., “Système nouveau”; GP IV, 485–486; quoted from G. W. Leibniz. Philosophical Essays, trans. by R. Ariew and D. Garber, Indianapolis – Cambridge 1989, pp. 144–145).

- In the first reference the first name of the author is given as initials before the surname; surname and title are separated by colons; between title and place of publication, year and page numbers (p. and pp. should be used) commas are used; name of publisher is usually omitted; between the title of an essay and the collection of essays in which it appears there is an “in” followed by a colon; series are given in brackets, an equals sign coming after the first bracket.

Footnotes

- Possible acknowledgements or references to earlier text versions should be included in the first footnote; they are then not numbered but are provided with an asterisk (*).

- Footnote numbers (without full stop or bracket) in the text are given in superscript form following, where necessary, the quotation marks and before the remaining punctuation marks.

- Footnote numbers (without full stop or bracket) in the footnote are not given in superscript form; the first word should begin with a capital letter, the footnote ends with a full stop.
